

55 F.3d 905
United States Court of Appeals,
Third Circuit.

FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE
CORPORATION, as Receiver for The Howard
Savings Bank, Appellee,

v.

Sidney F. WENTZ; Natalie I. Koether; William E.
Marfuggi; Robert M. Kremenz; J. Robert Hillier,
Natalie I. Koether and Sidney F. Wentz, Appellants.

No. 94-5556.

Argued April 20, 1995.

Decided June 5, 1995.

Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) sought enforcement of subpoena duces tecum against former bank directors seeking bank directors' and their family members' personal financial records. The United States District Court for the District of New Jersey, John C. Lifland, J., required directors to produce only their own records showing additions to or reductions in their assets. Directors appealed. The Court of Appeals, Weis, Circuit Judge, held that FDIC showed reasonable need for gaining access to directors' personal records to determine whether directors had improperly channeled bank funds for personal benefit, justifying enforcement of administrative subpoena to extent of records pertaining to additions to or diminutions in directors' personal assets.

Affirmed.

West Headnotes (7)

[1] Administrative Law and Procedure
🔑 Scope

Court of Appeals will affirm order enforcing agency subpoena unless it concludes that district court has abused its discretion; to determine whether there has been abuse of discretion, Court of Appeals must consider whether district court's decision was based on irrelevant factors or on clearly erroneous findings of fact, and whether there has been clear error of judgment.

3 Cases that cite this headnote

[2] Administrative Law and Procedure
🔑 Subpoenas Duces Tecum

To obtain enforcement of administrative subpoena, agency must show that investigation will be conducted pursuant to legitimate purpose, that inquiry is relevant, that information demanded is not already within agency's possession, and that administrative steps required by statute have been followed; demand for information must also not be unreasonably broad or burdensome.

9 Cases that cite this headnote

[3] Administrative Law and Procedure
🔑 Subpoenas Duces Tecum

It is not necessary, in most instances, that agency make showing of liability before seeking to enforce subpoena.

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[4] Administrative Law and Procedure
🔑 Subpoenas Duces Tecum

Subpoenaed party bears heavy burden of establishing abuse of court's process by agency seeking to enforce administrative subpoena.

3 Cases that cite this headnote

[5] Administrative Law and Procedure
🔑 Subpoenas Duces Tecum

When personal documents of individuals, as contrasted with business records of corporations, are subject of administrative subpoena, privacy concerns must be considered.

should seek attachment of assets.

1 Cases that cite this headnote

2 Cases that cite this headnote

[6]

Administrative Law and Procedure

🔑 Subpoenas Duces Tecum

Banks and Banking

🔑 Powers, Functions and Dealings in General

Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) was entitled to enforce subpoena duces tecum against former directors of bank for directors' personal financial records, limited to those pertaining to additions to or diminutions in directors' personal assets to determine whether records revealed breaches of fiduciary duties by directors through improper channeling of bank funds for personal benefit; strong public interest in safeguarding FDIC's legislative mandate to promptly resolve affairs of insolvent banks on behalf of creditors and depositors outweighed minimal intrusion into privacy surrounding directors' personal, financial records and any accompanying burdens of production. Federal Deposit Insurance Act, §§ 28, 211(2)(I)(i), (d)(17, 18), (k), 12 U.S.C.A. §§ 1818\(n\), 1821\(d\)\(2\)\(I\)\(i\), \(d\)\(17, 18\), \(k\).

3 Cases that cite this headnote

[7]

Administrative Law and Procedure

🔑 Subpoenas Duces Tecum

Banks and Banking

🔑 Powers, Functions and Dealings in General

Allegations by Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) of mishandling of certain loans by bank furnished proper basis for investigation by way of administrative subpoena into whether individual bank directors might be liable, whether there might be transfers of bank assets that should be avoided, and whether FDIC

Attorneys and Law Firms

*906 Laurence B. Orloff, (argued), Laura V. Studwell, Orloff, Lowenbach, Stifelman & Siegel, P.A., Roseland, NJ, for appellants.

Jerome A. Madden (argued), Ann S. DuRoss, Richard J. Osterman, Jr., F.D.I.C., Washington, DC, for appellee.

Before: STAPLETON, HUTCHINSON, and WEIS, Circuit Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT

WEIS, Circuit Judge.

In the course of its investigation of a failed depository institution, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation issued a subpoena to former directors of the bank directing them to produce a wide variety of their personal financial records as well as those of family members. The district court required the directors to produce only their own records, showing additions or reductions in their assets. Rejecting the directors' claims of privacy violations, we will affirm the district court's order.

Natalie I. Koether and Sidney F. Wentz were directors of The Howard Savings Bank of Livingston, New Jersey, which was declared insolvent on October 2, 1992. On that same day, the FDIC was appointed receiver.

In April 1993, the FDIC issued an "Order of Investigation" pursuant to 12 U.S.C. § 1820\(c\) and 12 C.F.R. § 303.9\(i\)\(2\), targeting former officers and directors of the bank. Four purposes were cited in the order: (1) *907 determining whether the individuals may be liable as a result of any action or inaction that could have affected the bank; (2) assessing whether the pursuit of litigation would be cost-effective by considering the ability of the individuals to satisfy a judgment; (3) establishing whether the FDIC should seek to avoid transfers of interests or incurrences of obligations; and (4) ascertaining whether the FDIC should seek attachments of assets. The order authorized FDIC representatives to issue subpoenas duces tecum.

The directors, together with other bank principals, were served with notices to appear for depositions and ordered to produce documents in some twenty-eight different categories covering the six-year period preceding October 1992. Included were records in their possession pertaining to bank operations. In addition, the subpoena demanded production of such documents as financial statements and credit applications of the directors and their spouses; records of any bank accounts of the directors and those maintained by “any member of [their] immediate famil[ies],” including canceled checks and bank statements; tax returns; title and registration papers for motor vehicles, boats, and airplanes; pension and profit-sharing plans in which the directors or their spouses had an interest; insurance policies; and records of inheritance, and other such gifts received by the directors and “any member of [their] immediate famil[ies].”

The directors timely complied with the requests for documents having any connection with their activities as officials of the bank, but refused to produce their personal records and those of their families.

In seeking enforcement of the subpoena in the district court, the FDIC presented the affidavit of James M. Judd, an investigations specialist for the FDIC. It stated that the documents were necessary to enable the FDIC to determine the nature and extent of any losses sustained by the bank because of negligence or breach of fiduciary duty by the directors, and to establish whether it would be cost-effective to pursue any such claims. The affidavit alleged that the directors had approved transactions that resulted in losses of millions of dollars and that the transactions “appear[ed] to exhibit inadequate documentation, unsafe concentrations of credit, poor credit administration, and inadequate supervision of management.” Finally, the affidavit asserted that the directors had been “warned repeatedly” by bank examiners about lax business practices at the bank, but that the deficiencies were not corrected.

The district court conducted a hearing and, at its conclusion, ordered the directors to produce all records that demonstrated increases or depletions in, or transfers of, their assets. As the judge explained,

“I do not sanction an inquiry whose sole purpose is to find out whether these folks have money to respond to a judgment, if one should eventuate.... [M]y requirement of document production ... is narrow enough to specifically address transfers or sudden accretions or depletions of wealth.... I feel that those purposes are reasonably within the power of the FDIC, and I feel that what I have ordered is a limited incursion into the financial affairs that is tailored to match up with the purposes that I have articulated.”

In a formal order filed a few days later, the court denied the FDIC’s request for enforcement of the subpoena duces tecum, except that the directors were instructed to produce:

“(a) All documents which relate to any increases or depletions of assets, or any transfer of assets, for the period October 1986 through the date of this Order; and

(b) All financial statements prepared by or on behalf of [the directors] from October 1986 through the date of this Order.”

The court then granted a stay of its order pending resolution of this appeal.

The directors now contend that (1) the FDIC’s statutory powers do not permit an unwarranted intrusion into their personal affairs, (2) the subpoenas were issued for an improper purpose, particularly in the context of “cost-effectiveness” of potential litigation that might be initiated by the FDIC, and (3) the documents sought are not relevant. The directors also complain that the FDIC offered no grounds for suspicion of wrongdoing *908 to justify issuance of a subpoena, and hence, it violates the Fourth Amendment.

Preliminarily, we observe that the district court’s order substantially narrows the subpoena in two significant aspects. First, the demand for production of documents of the directors’ spouses and immediate family members is no longer effective. Second, the documents that the directors must produce are limited to those pertaining to additions or diminutions of their own assets.

^[1] As an appellate court, we will affirm an order enforcing an agency’s subpoena unless we conclude that the district court has abused its discretion. NLRB v. Frazier, 966 F.2d 812, 815 (3d Cir.1992). To determine whether there has been an abuse of discretion, the reviewing court must consider whether the district court’s decision was based on irrelevant factors or on clearly erroneous findings of fact, and whether there has been a clear error of judgment. Id. “[T]he district court’s role is not that of a mere rubber stamp, but of an independent reviewing authority called upon to insure the integrity of the proceeding.” Wearly v. FTC, 616 F.2d 662, 665 (3d Cir.1980).

^[2] To obtain enforcement of an administrative subpoena, the agency must show that the investigation will be conducted pursuant to a legitimate purpose, that the inquiry is relevant, that the information demanded is not already within the agency’s possession, and that the administrative steps required by the statute have been followed. United States v. Powell, 379 U.S. 48, 57-58, 85 S.Ct. 248, 254-55, 13 L.Ed.2d 112 (1964); United States v. Morton Salt Co., 338 U.S. 632, 652, 70 S.Ct. 357, 368, 94 L.Ed. 401 (1950). The demand for information must not be unreasonably broad or burdensome. United States v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 788 F.2d 164, 166 (3d Cir.1986).

^[3] ^[4] It is not necessary, in most instances, that the agency make a showing of liability before seeking to enforce a subpoena. As the Supreme Court has observed, an agency “ ‘can investigate merely on suspicion that the law is being violated, or even just because it wants assurance that it is not.’ ” Powell, 379 U.S. at 57, 85 S.Ct. at 255 (quoting Morton Salt, 338 U.S. at 642-43, 70 S.Ct. at 364). The subpoenaed party bears the heavy burden of establishing an abuse of the court’s process. United States v. Cortese, 614 F.2d 914, 919 (3d Cir.1980).

^[5] When personal documents of individuals, as contrasted with business records of corporations, are the subject of an administrative subpoena, privacy concerns must be considered. See Whalen v. Roe, 429 U.S. 589, 599, 97 S.Ct. 869, 876, 51 L.Ed.2d 64 (1977). Thus, in United States v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 638 F.2d 570, 578 (3d Cir.1980), where a governmental agency sought production of employee medical records, we listed as relevant factors such matters as the type of record requested, the information that it might contain, the potential for harm and subsequent nonconsensual disclosure, the adequacy of safeguards to prevent unauthorized disclosure, the degree of need for access, the specificity of the agency’s statutory mandate, and the presence of recognizable public interests justifying access. See also In re McVane, 44 F.3d 1127, 1137 (2d Cir.1995) (agency subpoenas directed at individuals do implicate privacy rights); Resolution Trust Corp. v. Walde, 18 F.3d 943, 948 (D.C.Cir.1994) (same).

^[6] 12 U.S.C. § 1818(n) supplies the FDIC with the power to issue subpoenas duces tecum. The permissible purposes are set out in 12 U.S.C. § 1821(d)(2)(I)(i) as “carrying out any power, authority, or duty with respect to an insured depository institution (including determining any claim against the institution and determining and realizing upon any asset of any person in the course of collecting money due the institution).” The FDIC is empowered to avoid fraudulent asset transfers, 12 U.S.C. § 1821(d)(17), assert claims against directors and officers, id. § 1821(k), and seek court orders attaching assets, id. § 1821(d)(18).

Against this sweeping grant of power to the FDIC, we consider the challenges mounted by the directors. As noted earlier, the district court-entertaining grave doubts about the breadth of the subpoena, the relevance of documents of family members, and the burdens of production imposed on the *909 directors-substantially reduced the original scope of the subpoena. The FDIC has not challenged the district court’s order, and as the record now stands, the directors object only to producing those personal records that would show additions and subtractions to their private assets.

In applying the factors we identified in Westinghouse, 638 F.2d at 578, we observe at the outset that there is a significant public interest in promptly resolving the affairs of insolvent banks on behalf of their creditors and depositors, many of whom have lost significant sums of money and are often left with little hope for recovery. Personal financial records have never been as tightly guarded as “information concerning one’s body.” Id. at 577. Subpoenas and summonses of the Internal Revenue Service requiring production of such records have routinely been enforced. See, e.g., Pickel v. United States, 746 F.2d 176, 184 (3d Cir.1984).

The FDIC has shown a reasonable need for gaining access to the directors’ records in order to determine whether they reveal breaches of fiduciary duties through the improper channeling of bank funds for personal benefit. Moreover, the directors have not produced any evidence to show that the information contained in their personal financial records “is of such a high degree of sensitivity that the intrusion could be considered severe or that the [directors] are likely to suffer any adverse effects from disclosure to [FDIC] personnel.” Westinghouse, 638 F.2d at 579. Finally, we observe that regulatory provisions have been promulgated to guard against subsequent unauthorized disclosure of the subpoenaed information. See 12 C.F.R. pts. 309 & 310.

Accordingly, we conclude that the strong public interest in safeguarding the FDIC’s legislative mandate outweighs the minimal intrusion into the privacy that surrounds the directors’ personal financial records and any accompanying burdens of production.

^[7] In balancing competing interests in this case, we cannot say that the district court abused its discretion in concluding that the limited investigation it approved is relevant to the proper functions of the FDIC. Without impugning in any way the integrity of the directors, it must be observed that the allegations of mishandling of certain loans by the bank furnishes a proper basis for an investigation into (1) whether the individuals might be liable, (2) whether there might be transfers that should be avoided, or (3) whether the FDIC should seek attachment of assets.

We do not resolve the directors' contention that the FDIC must assert an articulable suspicion of liability before pursuing an inquiry into the cost-effectiveness of potential litigation against them. The directors rely heavily on McVane and Walde. However, in McVane, the Court found an adequate basis for enforcing the subpoena against directors even as to the cost-effectiveness factor. Walde did sustain an objection to the disclosure of personal records of certain directors for that limited purpose, but we need not discuss that case further in view of the fact that the district court's order here is sustainable on any one of the FDIC's other three objectives.

The directors also contend that the district court's order is too vague because, literally, a purchase of groceries would be included within the scope of the subpoena as a depletion of personal assets. At oral argument, counsel for the FDIC suggested that this difficulty might be avoided by reading into the order the $5,000 limitation on items stated in the subpoena itself. That appears to us to be a reasonable reading of the district court's order, but if it is not satisfactory to the parties, they may request further clarification from the district judge.

The order of the district court will be affirmed.

All Citations

55 F.3d 905, 63 USLW 2803